

WHAT ARE ARTICLES?

An article is a kind of adjective and as you may already know, adjectives modify -or further describe or identify the meaning of other words. There are two main types of adjectives:
descriptive and limiting.

Descriptive adjectives describe qualities or attributes [i.e. gray sky or beautiful morning.

Limiting adjectives identify or specify the words they modify. Articles fall into the category of limiting adjectives.

Articles* are a type of limiting adjective [adjectives that identify or specify the words they modify].

* a, an, and the

Indefinite and Definite Articles

Articles are farther divided into definite and indefinite. The is the definite article because it identifies or defines precisely which person or thing is being referred to. The words a or an are the indefinite articles. For example, if I say, "I wish I had the umbrella", it means that I'm referring to a particular umbrella. Maybe I'm thinking of my red and purple polka dotted umbrella that's in my car. If I say, "I wish I had an umbrella", it means that I wish I had any umbrella - I am not specifying a particular one.

Definite Article: The identifies exactly which person or thing is being referred to.

Indefinite Article: a or an does not specify a particular person or thing.

When to use "a" or "an "

Whether a or an should be used depends on the first letter of the word following the article. "A" should be used when the following word begins with a consonant (a chair) and an is used when the word begins with a vowel (an apple). The only exception is when the word begins with a long u sound - i.e. a university, a unicorn.

Use a when the following word begins with a consonant or a long u sound (i.e. a road, a university)

Use an when the following word begins with a vowel (a, e, i, o, u) (i.e. an apple, an office)

0://depVLSS/Handouts/Displayrack/What are articles